Individual Communion Cups. nue Baptist Church, of which Rev. G with dispatch. There was no irrever-ence, and no idle curiosity noticeable while the sacred service was in pro-

The paster prefaced the exercises by a few appropriate remarks. He spoke of the change of administering the wine in individual cups as one calculated to reduce the chances of conveying disease from person to person. He thought that no less dignity and soleanity would be observed by individual cups than when the single chalice was passed from mouth to mouth.

After this explanation the communion service was then proceeded with according to the prescribed rules of the Baptist Church. The people sat in their seats, and then the elders were

Dr. Forbes, whose microscopic re-searches into the scultary problem in-volved in the individual cup have attracted attention, was allowed to gather up indiscriminately at least a dozen cups for the purpose of obtaining the dregs and placing them under microscopic examination. The doctor, after thoroughly investigating the contents, now satisfied that the individual cup is an advance in the right direction. The dregs that I examined by my microscope after the communion service con cluded convinces me that it is a wise move. It is a singular fact, but it is tained hardly any secretion from the mouth, and the unused wine was remarkably clean. The were no epithe markably clean. The were no constitute scales observable through the lense, so that I concluded that it any dropped they must have clung to the ridge of the cup. The bowl of the chalice is so small that it practically prevents the scales from entering the wine, and even if they should, there could be no evil consequences resulting from them, because the cup once used undergoes a cleansing before it is used again.
